  In the source: “2 msk. stötta skorpor”

You will need

Method

1. [ ] Rinse and dry the apples, peel them, cut them into thin wedges and take out the cores.
2. [ ] Cook them with the sugar and the water to a purée.
3. [ ] Brown the crushed rusks lightly in 100 g butter.

4 ☐ Grease a tin or a frying pan with the butter and sprinkle it with the crushed rusks.

5 ☐ Put in three layers of the browned crumbs and two layers of the apple purée.

Notes

- If dried apples are used, the source rinses them well, soaks them for some hours in 200 ml of water and cooks them to a purée with 150 g of sugar.[1]
- The source says that gooseberries or rhubarb can be used instead of apples, but that more sugar is then needed.[1]

The apples

The source measures the apples by volume: one and a half litres of fresh apples, or 150 g of dried ones, and it names no variety.[1]

This recipe

It follows Iduns kokbok. The source uses metric measures; the US amounts are this site's conversions. This site has no kitchen and has not cooked the recipe.

What was changed: Translated from the Swedish. The source's first choice for the crumbs is half a 25-öre spiced loaf ("kryddlimpa"), not too fresh, grated: a quantity given by its price, which cannot be turned into a weight. We take instead the alternative it gives at the end of the recipe, 6 decilitres of crushed rusks, and brown them in butter as it does the grated loaf. Its hectograms and decilitres are written as grams and millilitres; its "msk." (matsked) is a tablespoon, but a larger one than today's: the recipe above this one on the same page has "1/2 msk. smör (10 gr.)", so we give the half spoonful of butter for the tin as 10 g. The two spoonfuls of crumbs for the tin are given as tablespoons. The sugar sprinkled over at the end has no amount. It names no oven temperature beyond "ordinär ugnsvärme", ordinary oven heat, and no size of tin. The cups and spoons in the US column are our conversions; the apples, which it measures by the litre, are converted by volume.
